

Any 5-10 year graduates here?

Been hesitant to post this since I don't think this is the right place, but whatever. I'm interested to know how those who graduated five to ten years ago are doing career-wise.

I graduated John Jay ten years ago as of next month. Had difficulty finding a decent job because employers prioritize experience over education. I've been at a dead end job for the past seven years. The pay is ok.

Anyway, I feel like getting a degree wasn't worth the time and effort. CUNY doesn't (or didn't) prepare its graduates for the job market. Those who've I've kept in contact with are in the same position I'm in now.

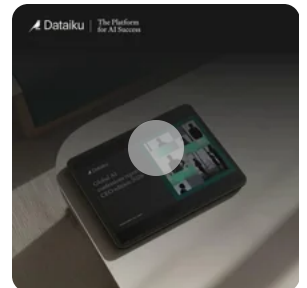

Anyone have the same experience?

40 21

This report reveals the 5 confessions shaping how CEOs are thinking about risk, performance, and what it takes to bring AI under control.

pages.dataiku.com

Join the conversation

Sort by: Best Search Comments

Schools don't help you in the actual job market, that's not their job. They're job is to educate you in whatever field you want to study but again, they don't help you in the job market, they have very little control over that (thats on the economy, the government, private sectors themselves etc). Now while you're an admitted student what another user said they can supply you with internships and programs after graduation that can lead you into a job but that's about it.

You mentioned you got a degree in Crim just. You never had a internship with NYPD or Department of Corrections? Last I checked the exam for Corrections Officer was up again, also NYPD has alot of jobs that aren't Police Officer at all. Just look on their website. Also I said this again, there's a common opportunities that can land you a job, look for seminars, career fairs (you're a CUNY Alumni, I'm sure you'll still be invited to all our career fairs we have around our 18 colleges) hiring events. Doesn't Jacob Javits center have a huge job fair 2x a year? Look into stuff like that. Don't get bummed out, it's ok you have a degree you already are ahead of 2/3rds of the American population (only about 38% of the U.S. population have at least a bachelor's degree). You just need to look, for real right now get off Reddit (I mean it in a sincere way) and start Googling Job Fairs NYC, Hiring events, Go on NYPD or the DOC website look for open positions. Again don't get bummed out

YetiGuy • 2y ago

Does 20 years count?

CCNY. EE major. I got an internship through a job fair held at the campus in my last year. I ended up joining that company after I graduated.

I went on to get an IVY league masters degree and am in a good leadership position now.

School can only do so much, 90% is what you can do.

[deleted] • 2y ago

I think the real question here is what your major was. I majored in mechanical engineering from CCNY Grove, graduated as the salutatorian, had multiple offers 3 months before I even graduated.

bxqnz89 OP • 2y ago

Criminal Justice

[deleted] • 2y ago

yeah you see, that's the problem. With just a Bachelor's in CJ, you're not likely to go far unfortunately irrespective of how well you do academically.

dwnarabbithole • 2y ago

Alum

I think it comes down to the majors. I graduated in 2012 with a bachelor's in architecture and found an entry job two weeks later at a small engineering firm.

I got my masters at a CUNY from 2020-2022 in a "worthless" degree (social work lol) but I also did a lot of networking and cold emailing and now I work at a nice position being paid almost six figures with great benefits. Usually with criminal justice majors, it's the NYPD or going onward to grad school/ Law school.

Don't give up

AdvantageNo3180 • 2y ago

What sources do you use to network? LinkedIn?

Tsionchi • 2y ago

LinkedIn + i made sure to get very close with my professors as they had connections too

AdvantageNo3180 • 2y ago

Thanks!

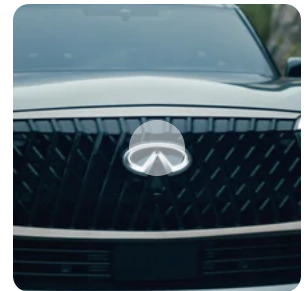

u/infiniti_official • Promoted

Style so sleek, it'll steal your breath.

Shop Now

infinitiusa.com

tweetibird • 2y ago

Alumni

Graduated fall 2018 in compsci from queens college No colleges really prepare you for the job market. Better colleges will help you land some internships faster which gives you insight into the job world. Your major also matters a lot. If you major in history or marketing, your prospects will be limited since the amount of jobs in the market is finite vs compsci, business, accounting where the number of jobs are always growing and in demand

fashionistaconquista • 2y ago

Compsci is cooked right now , people getting layed off , new openings are only outside the USA, more and more CS graduates every year with less and less jobs.

Except the average Cuny CS major does the bare minimum inside the classroom let alone outside the classroom

tweetibird • 2y ago

Alumni

The amount of mediocre engineers is the problem tbh. I'll interview others once in a while and always go for lc easy then medium. People don't even know how to use an array and later will add you on LinkedIn asking why they didn't get an offer.

Besides that, the demand for entry level engineers is super low. It's easier hiring engineers who did internships throughout college than people with high gpas but no experience since they onboard faster.

Other thing to consider is the responsibilities of engineers have grown a lot in the past few years. They barely cover those topics in college classes.

Wolastrone • 2y ago

Top 1% Commenter

Just curious, how was your job search after college? Have you been working in the field?

tweetibird • 2y ago

Alumni

Was difficult. Ended up doing a boot camp which lead to working as a contractor for a f500 company, working for a msft now.

[deleted] • 2y ago

Comment deleted by user

tweetibird • 2y ago

Alumni

that's the keyword, depending on where you join healthcare, its a shit show with the forced schedules, illegal practices and politics, the people i know that graduated in nursing that are dealing with shit like that where they can't control their schedule, last minute changes, 12-18 hour shifts, being assigned too many people, it's "in demand" but the hospitals (owned by corps/businesses) won't hire more people to alleviate the stress

i know maybe 1 biller (ab/ar) and 1 pharmacy tech dealing with similar shit and overworked but being expected to perform flawlessly

Create

atleast with corp jobs you have a typical 9-5, probably 10-15 hours more a week initially to onboard and learn the stuff and solid pay/benefits but those in nursing go through this abuse like a hazing ritual and won't have any control over their life. major respects if you can deal with it

Top-Combination-7718 • 2y ago

Hi i'm technically not a 5-10 year graduate (Just graduated last spring with the BA in Criminal Justice similar to yourself) and I am a Teach for America Corps member with a full time 6th grade ELA job in Brooklyn. A word of advice I can give you similar to another redditor is that it really isn't so much the degree, more the experience that you have (And the connections you make honestly along the way if possible) You should take a look at some potential crime analyst jobs maybe or even paralegal work? (If that's something you're into of course!) Unfortunately a lot of other graduates with the CJBA major struggle really bad to find employment (bunch of my friends are currently)

DatGuyKilo • 2y ago

Alum

Graduated back in 2021 from Hunter College, im now currently an enlisted member of the US Armed Forces, honestly wasn't too bad of a decision

Poisionmivy • 2y ago

Student

So what are you going to do? What steps are you planning to take??